EXERCISES

The world is full of examples of chemical reactions. Can you imagine how useful it is to know the amount of substances formed when given known quantities of reactants and the amount of reactants consumed? Think about an automotive engineer studying the performance of various engines. How much air (oxygen) will be produced due to the combustion of gasoline in a combustion engine? Or suppose you are in your kitchen to make 12 cups of coffee and you start with adequate quantity of sugar and milk. How much do you need to calculate the amount of milk required to be added? You need to be able to compare the amount in other questions without the knowledge of stoichiometry.
