Global average temperature is projected to rise from 50°F in 1950 to 78°F by 2099. This increase is driven by rising greenhouse gas concentrations, which trap heat in the atmosphere. The rate of warming is expected to accelerate in the latter half of the century, with significant impacts on ecosystems and human health. Sea level rise and more frequent extreme weather events are also projected as a result of climate change.

The frequency of extreme weather events is projected to increase significantly over the next century. This includes more frequent and intense heatwaves, droughts, and heavy precipitation events. The increase in frequency is due to the warming of the atmosphere, which holds more moisture and leads to more intense weather systems. These changes will have major implications for agriculture, infrastructure, and public health.

Sea level rise is another major concern, with projections showing a rise of 6.6 feet by 2100. This rise is caused by the thermal expansion of seawater and the melting of glaciers and ice sheets. Coastal cities and low-lying areas are at high risk of flooding and displacement. The economic and social impacts of sea level rise will be profound, requiring significant investment in coastal defense and adaptation strategies.

Overall, the projected changes in temperature and the frequency of extreme weather events highlight the urgent need for climate action. Reducing greenhouse gas emissions and transitioning to a sustainable energy system are essential to mitigate the worst impacts of climate change. International cooperation and policy changes are needed to address this global challenge effectively.
