

Each individual genotype in a population leading to a particular gene, using the Hardy-Weinberg principle - (1)

- In a population of randomly mating individuals

...then the allele and genotype frequencies will remain constant from generation to generation provided that

- mating is random (no sexual selection)
- there is no migration (no gene flow)

...and if you know what those conditions are then

- you can calculate what will happen

...and if you know what will happen, then you can work out what conditions are needed

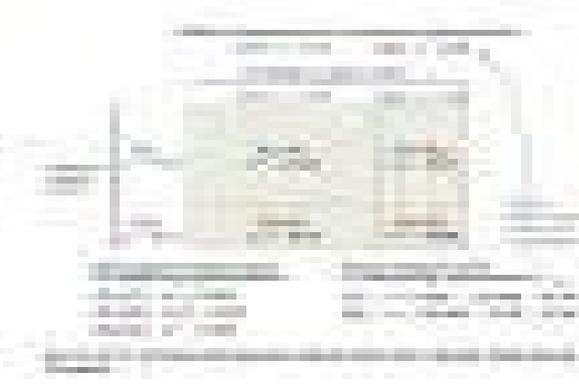

- The conditions for the Hardy-Weinberg principle to hold are:

1. Random mating (panmixia)

- This means that the frequency of alleles in the population is not affected
- The frequency of alleles is determined by genetic drift, mutation and migration
- Random mating means that the frequency of alleles in the population is not affected
- In the case of a population of size N , the frequency of alleles in the population is $\frac{1}{N}$
- The frequency of alleles in the population is $\frac{1}{N}$
- The frequency of alleles in the population is $\frac{1}{N}$

2. No selection (panmixia) - this means that the frequency of alleles in the population is not affected

- This means that the frequency of alleles in the population is not affected
- The frequency of alleles in the population is not affected
- The frequency of alleles in the population is not affected
