

Food Chains and Energy Flow in Ecosystems

All organisms need an input of energy, and ultimately they use it to do the same things: the first step is to take photosynthesis (autotrophs) or to eat (heterotrophs) and then pass it on to another level.

The starting molecules, because organisms must use them, produce a flow, or a pathway, of energy that is used to do work. Primary consumers (herbivores), secondary consumers (carnivores) and the plants and algae that create and transfer secondary consumers (omnivores) are all part of the pathway that carries their energy and matter. If you add another consumer level to the chain, the energy flow becomes more complex. These food chains, however, do not show the pathways in which the matter that is transferred is recycled, as they are available for another generation of photosynthesis.

When a consumer eats another organism, only a small fraction of the energy taken in is used to generate matter (ATP) to do work or to be stored as glycogen and to produce new cells. About 90% of the energy of the food is lost as heat or used by the organism for other purposes, leaving only about 10% of the energy available as energy to the next trophic level in the food chain. This loss is related to the second of the laws of thermodynamics: a payment of energy and a payment of matter is made. The loss of the payment of energy and the larger payment of matter to the next level of the pathway is at the top of the pathway in the diagram available in the next chapter.
