

has to overcome is the differences of orientation towards teaching and learning between Denny and Cynthia. Denny's background is from the military where there are right and wrong answers for every problem whereas with Cynthia, she is more into a constructivist approach where the process of learning is more important than providing the right or wrong answer.

Second, Cynthia has not given Denny a clear objective about his job. Denny was used to a clearly defined learning objective and having a vague instruction is giving him difficulty in doing the job.

Summarize at least three (3) instructional strategies that would be appropriate for this case.

Before drafting any instructional strategies, Denny has first to be acquainted with the epistemological framework of which Cynthia Oakes operates – which is the constructivist approach. Constructivism is ongoing meaning-making through authentic engagement- remains a useful idea for learners and instructors at all levels of education and training (Reiser & Dempsey, 2012). This is to ensure that they speak the same language and able to design the instruction program to the satisfaction of the stakeholders. This would entail needs analysis, research, interview and a lot of resourcefulness on the part of Denny.

Second, Denny has to craft a program that is consistent with the constructivist approach which engages learners in a process of inquiry and activity instead of providing the right answer. Denny's program has to generate multiple possible answer from his students in solving a certain problem which is a valuable process of constructivist approach. This would include tools that would facilitate discussion that promotes the process of inquiry and activity.
