

Elements, Compounds, and Mixtures

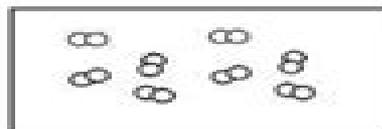

Introduction

Elements are the simplest and most basic forms of matter. Elements cannot be broken down into any simpler substance – all known matter in the universe is made of elements.

Some elements are made up of single, individual atoms.

Other elements are made of molecules, which have two or more atoms joined together. In each of these examples, shown to the right, the elements are composed of only one type of atom.

When atoms of two or more different elements chemically combine, they form a new substance with completely different properties. These are known as compounds. Similar to elements, all of the molecules in a compound are identical to each other. Both elements and compounds are pure substances.

Elements and compounds do not always chemically react with each other. If different elements or compounds are placed together, but do not react, they are considered a mixture. Elements and compounds in mixtures retain their individual properties.

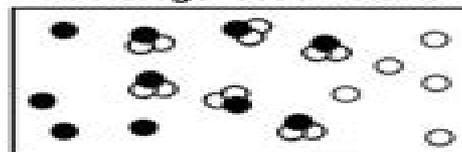

Homogeneous mixtures are uniform – they have the same composition throughout. Heterogeneous mixtures are not uniform. In a heterogeneous mixture, some areas may have higher or lower concentrations of the individual substances.
