Weekly Question What causes a species to become extinct?

Background extinction affects only a few species at a given time. The most common cause is a change in the species' habitat. Even small changes in temperature can disrupt the balance of nature and cause the death of one or more species in that habitat. There are also many other causes of background extinction. For example, competition between two species for the same niche often leads to the extinction of the weaker species. Predation, or the killing of one species by another, can cause extinction if there are too many predators.

Weekly Question What causes a species to become extinct?

Because a large number of animals have gone extinct over the past few thousand years, many scientists believe that we are in the middle of the next mass extinction. The main cause of this extinction event is human activity. People are changing the environment much faster than most species can adapt. As the human population grows, people expand into natural areas, building cities where there were once forests, wetlands, or deserts. In the process, humans are using up natural resources and creating pollution to the point where the habitats can no longer support life. Another way that humans cause extinctions is by
