

Goblin Sharks

Goblin Sharks were named after the goblins that often show up in Japanese folklore. They live along continental shelves in the bottom of the ocean. They are pink in color and quite large. They can be as long as twelve feet and weigh almost half a ton.

The Goblin Shark has a very long, flat, narrow snout which is disproportionately large at birth. Since their bodies grow faster than their noses, eventually a little Goblin Shark will grow into its nose, though they always seem out of proportion. Inside its snout are many electroreceptors called ampullae of Lorenzini. These help the shark to sense the heartbeats of the tiny creatures it eats, even though it can't see them in the deep, completely dark water. Inside this snout, its teeth look like fangs. The jaw of a goblin shark is connected to ligaments (bands of skin tissue) that can unfold from its snout, allowing it to thrust out its jaw up to three inches to seize its prey. These features seem to be its main advantages, as the Goblin Shark has small fins, a weak skeleton, poorly-developed muscles, and poor eyesight. It is the only living representative of the Mitsukurinidae family, which has been around for over a hundred million years.

Though Goblin Sharks are sometimes seen off the coast of Japan. Scientists don't know much about them, though believe them to be solitary like other species of sharks. They also think they are probably active primarily in the mornings and the evenings. Though they are slow-moving, their extendable jaw gives them an advantage in catching fleeing prey such as teleost fish and squid.
