

1. Environmental Impacts (pp. 12-13)

Energy development and environmental challenges are particularly acute in the tropical regions, which are vulnerable.

A significant challenge faces environmental activists a limited range of policy options open to nations with limited energy resources.

Two examples of significant environmental issues are:

- (1) Deforestation
- (2) Soil pollution and a degradation of land quality
- (3) Water quality deterioration
- (4) Water Pollution

Deforestation is characterized as a form of environmental degradation.

Environmental degradation is increasing rapidly worldwide.

Regional forests & systems have significant ecological value within a limited range of options.

One approach to forest and other resources is to manage them as open space resources that renew.

Regional forests & systems are increasingly being regarded as open space resources and managed.

A critical challenge is to manage them as open space resources or manage them as closed space resources. Environmentalists are opposed to the latter approach.

In the forest, open space resources include ecosystems with high biological diversity and are not subject to significant disturbance or degradation. They include primary forests, which are open space resources.

Open space resources are not open space resources that require management or are not open space resources.

Open space resources are not open space resources that require management or are not open space resources.

Regional forests & systems are increasingly being regarded as open space resources and managed as open space resources.

Open space resources are not open space resources.
