

The Boss Came to Dinner

Mr. Shammath had invited his boss to dinner. Neither he nor his wife could pause even to wipe the perspiration from their faces. The wife, in a dressing gown, her tangled hair tied in a knot, her make-up all smudged, and he, pencil and paper in hand and smoking cigarette after cigarette, ran from room to room, ticking off items in a long list.

By five, they had succeeded in putting some kind of order into the arrangements. Chairs, tables, side tables, napkins, flowers, they were all there in the verandah, neatly arranged. Now they turned their attention to the bric-a-brac in the room, either shifting them behind the almirahs or shoving them under the bedsteads. Suddenly a problem reared up before Shammath. What about mother? Till now neither he nor his wife had thought of it. Shammath turned on his heels and asked his wife in English: 'And what about mother?'

The wife, interrupting her work, did some hard thinking. 'We'll send her to the neighbours. She can stay there for the night. We'll bring her back tomorrow.' Shammath, screwed up his eyes and looked at her thoughtfully. 'No, that won't do. I want to give a wide berth to that next-door hag. If mother stays the night with her, she will again start coming to our house. I tell you what. We will tell mother to finish her meal early and retire to her room. The guests won't start coming before eight.'

The proposition sounded right. But suddenly the wife said, 'But if she falls asleep and starts snoring! Then? Her room is next to where dinner will be served.'

'We'll ask her to close the door and I'll lock it from the outside. Or, better still, I'll ask mother not to fall asleep. She must keep awake and sitting.'

'But suppose she does fall asleep. You never know how long dinner will last. In any case, you can't leave the bar before eleven.'

Shammath threw up his hands in irritation. 'She was going to visit her brother and you stuck your nose in. Wanted to keep up appearances before your friends. Now what do we do?'

'Tchah! Why should I earn a bad name by coming between mother and son? I wash my hands of this affair. Do as you please.'

Mr. Shammath held his peace. This was no time for bandying words, but for cool thinking. He turned round and looked at mother's room. Her room opened onto the verandah. As his gaze swept over the verandah, a thought flashed through his mind. 'I've got it!' he said. Promptly he strode towards mother's room. With her back against the wall, mother was sitting on a low wooden chowki, her face almost covered with the dopatta. She was telling her beads. Since morning she had been nervous at the goings-
