EMERGENCY CHECKLIST: WIND

Studies of severe windstorms show conclusively that windstorm-related damage can be prevented or at least minimized with an organized plan of action before, during and after a storm. Hurricanes, typhoons and cyclones are all tropical storms caused by severe low pressure systems, but they are called different names depending on where they occur. In the Caribbean, the Gulf of Mexico and the United States, these storms are called hurricanes, but in the West Pacific (China, Hong Kong, Japan, Korea, the Philippines, Taiwan), they are known as typhoons. And, in the South Pacific (Australia, Fiji, Samoa) and Indian Ocean, they are called cyclones.

PRE-WINDSTORM PLANNING

- Develop a windstorm emergency response plan, and educate appropriate personnel in its aims and procedures.
- Staff and train an emergency response team (ERT) whose members are willing to stay on site during a windstorm (if safe to do so). Ask for volunteers. Arrange for support/assistance during the storm for families of those who will remain at the facility. Also, notify local emergency preparedness authorities about your plans to have personnel on site.
- Designate a weather monitor who will report weather conditions and keep the ERT leader up-to-date on conditions before, during and after a windstorm.
- Give the ERT leader the authority to implement the plan based on predetermined checkpoints (e.g., when a storm is within a certain distance from a facility). This responsibility includes shutting down operations and sending personnel home.
- The ERT leader also should ensure that operational managers carry out predetermined tasks at each warning stage of the storm. To guarantee this, task checklists should be distributed to all involved, completed and returned to the ERT leader.
