Calibration Technology, Theories and Applications Ikumatsu Fujimoto, Kunitoshi Nishimura, 2013 A calibration procedure is generally an operation to determine a relationship between an output and an input of an instrument or an essential value of a measuring object in a measuring system In other words calibration is a comparison of a measuring device against a standard instrument of higher accuracy In measuring fields the calibration is clearly confirmed in the traceability system The traceability is defined as the property of a result of a measurement whereby it can be related to strictly defined standards in general nationally or internationally recognized through an unbroken chain of comparisons Namely all calibrations are strictly defined to be performed traceable to a nationally or internationally recognized standard in a measuring field The term calibration is used not only in measuring fields but also in meteorology chemistry and economics Also in these fields the term calibration is used as an operation to adjust and or compensate a measuring system and a method for accurately determining the relational expression between an input output of an instrument using suitable standards for example an appropriate global optimization method However compared to the measuring field in these other research areas the calibration seems to be defined in a less systematic way possibly due to the different nature of these disciplines In this volume calibration is defined in the above mentioned broad sense of the term and the topics for discussion are broad and abundant The standard of calibration as a method which is confirmed systematically in the measurement field has been developing also in other disciplines They have many research issues but constitute a promising area of research
