

The condition shown in Figure 32 also places a horizontal force component into the piping system. For example, assume a pipe weight of 1000 lb. for the above hanger, as in Figure 33.

The 258 lb. horizontal force by itself may not be of great consequence, but where there is a series of hangers located on the same long section of pipe, the effect of the total horizontal force can be serious. (See Figure 34)

$$\text{Total horizontal force} = 86 + 172 + 258 + 344 = 860 \text{ lb}$$

Certainly, for any system subject to horizontal expansion, the rod angularity from the vertical will result in a horizontal force component. The point where this angularity becomes critical cannot be defined for every case, but accepted practice is to limit the swing from the vertical to 4°.

Where this angle is greater than 4°, a pipe roller should be considered.

Pipe roller supports are of two basic types: those which attach to overhead structure, and those which are placed beneath the pipe as base supports (see Figure 35).

It should be noted that where rollers are required, the pipe operating temperatures usually are sufficiently high that pipe insulation is used to reduce heat loss and for personnel protection. In these cases a pipe covering protection saddle should be used in conjunction with the rollers to keep the insulation from crushing.

Where the piping is not insulated, the pipe will rest directly on the roller. This is common practice for the support of long transmission lines where the gas or fluid transported is not of elevated operating temperatures, but where the pipe run is subject to some change in ambient temperature, as from summer to winter variations.

For example, a pipe line 300 ft. long subject to ambient changes from 70° F to 110° F expands only .00306 in./ft. from the low to high temperature. Multiplied by 300 ft., however, the total axial expansion is 300 ft. x .00306 in./ft., or .918 in.

In instances of this nature, rollers will be used, but the pipe covering protection saddles will not be required.

For economy in the support of low pressure, low temperature systems, and long outdoor transmission lines, hanger spans may be based on the allowable total stresses of the pipe and the amount of allowable deflection between supports.
