

Lab 20 – Using Bioinformatics to Investigate Evolutionary Relationships: Mouse vs. BLAST

Introduction:

Genomic information, especially genome-wide (genomewide) sequence data, provides a rich source of information for understanding evolutionary relationships and processes. The ability to compare genomic data across species, including the ability to compare and contrast genomes, provides a powerful tool for understanding the genetic basis of these relationships and processes.

One of the most important applications of this information is the ability to identify the genetic basis of complex traits. This is done by comparing the genomes of different species and identifying the genes that are shared between them. This process is often done using a technique called BLAST (Basic Local Alignment Search Tool).

Suppose you identify a single gene that is responsible for a particular trait in a mouse. How do you know that this gene is the same as the one in a human? One way to find out is to compare the mouse gene to the human gene. This can be done using BLAST. The BLAST algorithm will search a database of human genes and return a list of genes that are similar to the mouse gene. This list can then be used to identify the human gene that is most similar to the mouse gene.

BLAST (Basic Local Alignment Search Tool) is a computer program that is used to search a database of sequences for a specific sequence. It is often used to identify genes that are similar to a known gene. BLAST works by comparing a query sequence to a database of sequences and returning a list of sequences that are similar to the query. The BLAST algorithm is based on the principle of local alignment, which means that it only considers small regions of the query and database sequences.

In this assignment, you will use BLAST to identify a human gene that is similar to a mouse gene. You will also use BLAST to identify a mouse gene that is similar to a human gene. This will allow you to compare the genomes of different species and identify the genes that are shared between them.

Figure 1 shows the results of a BLAST search for a mouse gene. The results show that the mouse gene is most similar to a human gene.

Figure 2 shows the results of a BLAST search for a human gene. The results show that the human gene is most similar to a mouse gene. This demonstrates that the mouse and human genomes are highly similar, and that many genes are shared between the two species.
