

EVIDENCE CHANGE

Evidence of chemical change includes observable markers such as colour shifts, gas evolution, precipitate formation, temperature change, and insolubility under ordinary conditions. These indicators help identify when a new substance has formed, distinguishing chemical reactions from simple physical changes. For example, rust forming on iron, electrolysis, combustion of wood, gas evolving from acid tests, and scale formation in boilers are common occurrences in the province that signify chemical processes at work.

Chemical changes are characterized by a change in the composition of substances, which often results in visible signs. Colour changes indicate new substances are produced, as seen in rust or food coloring. Gas evolution occurs when gases like oxygen, carbon dioxide, or hydrogen are released during reactions such as fermentation or burning. Precipitates form when the mixture of two liquids yields a solid, recognized by clumpiness or cloudiness. Temperature changes, either heat absorption or release, are typical of exothermic reactions, as seen in exothermic reactions or endothermic reactions. Finally, insolubility occurs when two substances combine to form a solid, such as in precipitation reactions, or when a gas is evolved, such as in acid-base reactions, or when a gas is evolved, such as in acid-base reactions.
