Krannich, Suzan Kiepper Krannich, 2015-05-01 Designed for better controlling one's anger this powerful little guide covers it all examines the nature of anger surveys 11 key myths and realities shows how anger differs with men and women identifies major anger triggers reveals the high costs of anger specifies self help techniques identifies how to get professional help offers a commitment to change contract Two sections on self help and getting help cover everything from reducing stress joining anger management classes and forming a support group to finding a good therapist taking medications and even acquiring a loving pet Jam packed with revealing self tests examples exercises tips techniques and resources for changing attitudes and behaviors that lead to creating a new anger free you Anger Management Patricia Carlisle, 2017-12-11 Among the first milestones in anger management classes is pinpointing what your anger triggers are This simply means analyzing your day to day life and check for conditions or features in people who may have you seeing red sometimes on a fairly good day As well as acknowledging you have anger management issues Knowing specifically what triggers set you off are very important should you wish to explore ways to control yourself in certain situations Everyone is built differently and this means no two people have similar anger management problems or triggers This is why experts discourage persons from following other individuals anger management plans instead of visiting classes by themselves Especially when a close friend of yours has overcome his or her troubles by using a specific technique or routine there is no guarantee a similar program will work for your needs In most anger management classes people are asked to divide their triggers into two classes those he or she can control and those which are out of their control A common example of a trigger that is within one's control is if you happen to be a perfectionist and you simply react negatively if an assignment isn't going as intended. Other triggers like traffic and disasters are outside of a person's control and must be controlled differently as well. The way you manage your anger is dependent upon whatever you do when you're angry. People who usually get physical when they're mad undertake hobbies and interests like boxing, remodeling, and hunting. With these hobbies and interests, people are able to channel their anger and also be productive along the way.
