Maintenance models for systems subject to measurable deterioration Robin Pieter Nicolai, 2008 Complex engineering systems such as bridges roads flood defence structures and power pylons play an important role in our society Unfortunately such systems are subject to deterioration meaning that in course of time their condition falls from higher to lower and possibly even to unacceptable levels Maintenance actions such as inspection local repair and replacement should be done to retain such systems in or restore them to acceptable operating conditions After all the economic consequences of malfunctioning infrastructure systems can be huge In the life cycle management of engineering systems the decisions regarding the timing and the type of maintenance depend on the temporal uncertainty associated with the deterioration Hence it is of importance to model this uncertainty In the literature deterioration models based on Brownian motion and gamma process have had much attention but a thorough comparison of these models lacks In this thesis both models are compared on several aspects both in a theoretical as well as in an empirical setting Moreover they are compared with physical process models which can capture structural insights into the underlying process For the latter a new framework is developed to draw inference Next models for imperfect maintenance are investigated Finally a review is given for systems consisting of multiple components

Economic Interdependence Between Oil Producing and Labor Exporting Countries Khalid Alkhatlan, 2008 Oil and workers remittances play an important role in the international economy Only a few articles have been trying to investigate the effects of oil price fluctuations on both oil producing and labor exporting countries For oil producing countries the concentration in production might be the main reason for the fluctuation in export earnings that lead to large changes in export revenues Because of the lack of skilled labor in oil producing countries they are heavily dependant on the skilled workers from labor exporting countries such as Pakistan India Bangladesh Egypt the Philippines and other countries So any oil shock is expected to harm labor exporting countries by influencing the workers remittances This book is expected to enrich the international library with the importance of workers remittances to labor exporting countries I hope that this book will help the international community to realize how negatively the oil price fluctuations would influence poor countries labor exporting countries through affecting workers remittances which are important to macroeconomic variables such as investment consumption and thus gross domestic product GDP

The Economics of Public Spending Hassan Bougrine,2000 The volume demonstrates that the strategy of public sector downsizing is based on a misleading conception of public finance It seeks to dispel several myths about public deficits and debts offering alternative approaches to fiscal and monetary policies The contributors argue that the public sector is crucial for economic growth that budget deficits are required for improving the performance of the private sector and that there is a real need for an economic agenda based on public deficits and low stable real interest rates in order to achieve full employment with high wages more generous social programmes and sustainable inflation
