GENETIC VARIATION AND SURVIVAL

30
QUESTIONS

Genetic Variation and Survival

In any population of living organisms, there is genetic variation, which means individuals have different traits. These differences can be in characteristics that control how an organism (Genetic variation happens because of changes in DNA that are passed from parents to offspring. For example, some moths in a population may have light wings, while others have dark wings. This variation is important because it gives some individuals traits that can help them survive better in their environment.

The environment plays a big role in determining which traits are helpful. If a moth lives in a forest where trees have leaves covered by snow from pollution, darker moths are less likely to be seen compared to lighter moths. Because the dark-colored moths can hide better, they have a higher chance of surviving and reproducing. Over time, the population will have more dark-colored moths because their traits increase their probability of survival and reproduction. This is an example of natural selection, where the environment "selects" traits that are beneficial.

Survivors can pass on their genes to offspring, which can lead to changes in a population. For example, if 70 out of 100 moths are dark and 30 are light, and predators catch 50% of light moths but only 10% of dark moths, more dark moths will survive and have offspring. This leads to a higher proportion of dark moths in the next generation. By studying these moths, scientists can explain how genetic variation and the environment work together to affect which individuals are more likely to live and reproduce.

Mark if the statement is True (T) or False (F).
