Martin MAC 350 Entour

By: Mike Wood

I've reviewed quite a few LED-based products over the last few years, as we've followed the evolution of entertainment lighting products using them as light sources. The first products in that evolution were floods with very little beam control; they were followed by wash units with optical zoom systems. Today, we get to review our first LED-based spot unit, the Martin MAC 350 Entour. Although it's the first to be reviewed here, it's not the first LED-based spot on the market, but it is definitely one of the first with light levels high enough to make it directly comparable with more conventional automated spot units. The way Martin Professional achieves its high output also makes it unusual in another way: The MAC 350 Entour only uses white LEDs. This means no RGB additive color mixing and thus a reliance on dichroics for color. More about that, and the associated pros and cons, later in the review.

This review follows the normal format; I take a single unit supplied to me by Martin Professional as typical of the product—The MAC 350 Entour has only just been launched, so I was sent one of the very first units straight off the production line—and take measurements of everything I can think of that's measurable, from light source to output. The MAC 350 Entour is fitted with a universal power supply rated from 100-240V 50/60Hz, and, for these tests, the luminaire was run from a nominal 115V 60Hz supply (Figure 1).

Light source and primary optics

The light source makes this product particularly interesting—but, because of its nature, it is also one of the hardest components to evaluate. With a rated life in excess of 60,000 hours (nearly seven years if the unit ran 24/7, or over 20 years running a more realistic eight hours a day), changing a lamp isn't something you should ever have to do. This also means that getting to, and replacing, the light source becomes a service task performed by a maintenance shop rather than something that has to be made easily accessible for the end-user.

The MAC 350 Entour uses seven CBT-60 LEDs from Luminous Devices. These are very high-power LEDs, each rated to handle 50W of power. They are also small, and it is this high power density, along with the heat transmission systems included in their packages, that is making Luminous Devices products more and more common in entertainment lighting products. As I've mentioned before, the key to a long and happy life for your LED emitters is keeping them cool—they'll take everything you can throw at them as long as you keep their temperature controlled. Martin takes those seven packages on their copper and ceramic board—and their 350W of heat—and mounts them directly to a large aluminum heat sink. Figure 2 shows a
