

Mass and Molar Relationships in a Reaction

Introduction

In stoichiometric calculations, reactants and products are both substances and products. Coefficients are used to write the balanced equation by which the law of conservation of mass, atoms are not "created" during the reaction, but they are rearranged. The mass ratio coefficients are written that way so that the balanced molecular equation (which is a formula) can still be the ratio of moles of all species involved in the combination.

A balanced chemical equation provides relative information:

and, if you multiply each by 10^{23} , stoichiometrically, molecules, then the relationships are:

If you do a mass problem for a substance as it is involved in any chemical reaction, that is, substance that reacts, mass, and amount of grams:

By adding, mass of the reactants and products are given, they must be equal (conservation):

After identifying the mass of reacting matter, it is possible to know the mass of products which are those that formed in the reacting system. Using the ratio will allow you to make other calculations since the masses of all reactants and products involved are equal. This relationship is the mass ratio and mass relationship among reactants and products given:

Essential Equations

These stoichiometric equations help us determine the mass of reactants, products, and products in a chemical reaction.
