Clinical Experience With the Biofragmentable Anastomotic Ring

Use of the biofragmentable anastomosis ring (BAR) was attempted in 33 patients at two New York City institutions and employed in 31 instances. Anastomoses performed were end-to-end enterocolic (n = 15), colocolic (n = 15), and side-to-side colocolic (n = 1). Patients ranged in age from 27 to 86 years, with the following diagnoses: primary colon cancer, 15; sessile adenoma, four; colostomy, five; diverticulosis, two; metastatic cancer with obstruction, multiple polyposis, perforated appendiceal mass, malignant carcinoid of appendix, intussuscepting right colon mass, one each. In two instances use of the device was aborted because of concern with the blood supply to the bowel wall in one and tissue edema in another. The average duration of postoperative ileus was 4.7 days. Two patients were subsequently treated for small bowel obstruction thought unrelated to use of the anastomotic device. There were no deaths and no evidence of stricture.

The concept of a sutureless intestinal anastomosis has been attractive to surgeons for many years. Beginning in the early 19th century, surgical investigators have designed ingenious but often complicated devices to achieve end-to-end intestinal anastomosis.<sup>1</sup> The Murphy Button described in 1892<sup>2</sup> has historically been a popular prototype for such a device despite its lack of clinical success. The limitations of the Murphy Button were: (1) it caused necrosis at the site of anastomosis; (2) it was a metallic foreign body that remained in the lumen of the bowel until intestinal slough occurred at the anastomosis and the device was passed in the stool; and (3) the lumen for passage of intestinal content was small. Renewal of the concept of a sutureless anastomosis has been possible with current biochemical and engineering technology. The development of biodegradable materials for sutures and implantation devices coupled with enthusiastic adoption of automated instruments for intraluminal stapling have been important factors in this trend. In 1985, Hardy et al.<sup>3</sup> first reported an experimental study of a biofragmentable anastomosis ring (BAR), which included some of the basic features of the Murphy Button but avoided the complications and limitations of that device. Comparative animal laboratory studies have demonstrated the success of the BAR in achieving end-to-end colonic anastomosis with few significant complications.<sup>4</sup> Early clinical studies have confirmed the utility of the device and its safety when compared with sutured and stapled anastomoses.<sup>5,6</sup> In approximately 17% of cases, however, intraoperative problems have occurred, including mucosal and serosal splitting, pursestring inadequacy, incorrect device size, and inadvertent ejection of the device. With attention to technical details and greater experience, later clinical trials have shown that the complication rate for the BAR is not statistically dif-
