

Case Study - Drug Abuse

Introduction

The case study approach of this module has been designed to create an awareness of the general classroom behavioral problems that may be encountered on a day to day basis. The examples here are generalised and may be applied to situations other than the ones given here.

Description of the problem

After the lunch recess, Mrs Andrews began a science lesson. As she was presenting the lesson, she noticed that Nathan was being very inattentive. He seemed to be drowsy and had trouble keeping his attention focused on the presentation. When she asked him a question, he simply shrugged and said he didn't know the answer. Mrs Andrews also noticed that Nathan's eyes were red. This is the third time Nathan has acted strangely and Mrs Andrews is afraid that he might be experimenting with drugs.

Causes

Nathan may, indeed be experimenting with drugs. His behavior suggests that he may have gotten 'high' on marijuana during lunch. However, the teacher cannot jump to this conclusion. Nathan's behavior and physical appearance could also indicate an allergic reaction, a reaction to medication, a reaction to something he ate, or any number of other factors. It isn't possible to determine whether a student is experimenting with drugs based only on the behaviors that the student exhibits.

If the student is using drugs, there are many possible reasons why this may be so; some reasons might be peer pressure, feelings of insecurity, problems at home, curiosity, tension, and many other factors. It's beyond the scope of this section to explore the myriad reasons a student might experiment with drugs. Rather, this section suggests a way that the teacher may determine whether the student does have a drug problem and, if do, how to proceed in getting the student professional assistance.
