

Chapter 8

Measuring Life-Cycle Costs

QUESTIONS

- Q.1 The total life-cycle costing approach is a comprehensive way for managers to understand and manage costs through a product's design, development, manufacturing, marketing, distribution, maintenance, service, and disposal stages. It differs from other processes and accounting, all costs along the value chain. Using this approach can lead to substantial cost savings. The water treatment, WWTPL, of a plant's total life costs are estimated by allocations made to the WWTPL using value-chain/price improvement of managing activities along the value chain.
- Q.2 The three major stages of the total life-cycle costing approach are (i) research, development and engineering (RD&E), (ii) manufacturing, and (iii) post-sale service and disposal.
- Q.3 Controlled costs are those that the organization agrees must be met while the responsibility for these product costs through the three major stages of the life cycle. Costs measured are the actual costs that the organization has paid over the three major stages of the product life-cycle.
- Q.4 The three advantages of the WWTPL stage are (i) using market research to assess emerging customer needs that lead to new generations of new products, (ii) get value through sharing valuable information and experience through the embedded aspects of other products, and (iii) product development, sharing which the company retains the features critical to customer satisfaction and design/compatibility, production/operations, and any special testing required.
- Q.5 During the post-sale service and disposal stage, organizations have to consider both the costs involved in providing service to products as well as there are both kinds of revenues, as well as the costs of ultimately disposing of the product. The following three advantages typically occur during this stage: (i) capital growth from the time that product is stopped through the growth stage of its sales, (ii) revenues from the peak of sales to the peak in
