

Task 2: DNA Replication

The newly synthesized or copies (daughter molecules) synthesized by an individual's replication fork consist of one newly-synthesized strand (labeled discontinuous) and one parental (pre-existing) strand. The discontinuous strand is synthesized by multiple RNA primers and a continuous strand. Each primer is 5' to 3' and grows towards the fork while the continuous strand grows away from the fork.

The genetic information (instructions) for structural proteins, such as myoglobin, is contained in the total gene, that is the complete DNA molecule. Some DNA molecules have gene segments that code for specific polypeptides. These are called genes. Genes are located on chromosomes.

Continuous Synthesis:

Continuous synthesis is the synthesis of a DNA strand in a single direction. This is the synthesis of the leading strand. The synthesis of the lagging strand is discontinuous.
