The MDPI journal Microorganisms is still very young, having been launched in 2013, but the concept of the microorganism has been in use for at least a century as a unifying principle for the discipline of microbiology, which was cemented firmly by the intellectual work of Roger Stanier and colleagues in their Microbial World and other general microbiology textbooks and related articles from the 1950s to the 1970s [1,2]. Merging the idea of the microscopic and the very small with the older idea of an organism as a living entity or cell, the concept of a microorganism enabled a real appreciation of the microbial world as one that is amenable to study using similar tools and approaches even though representing distinctly different types of reproductive units and cell organizations. In the late 20th century following the work of Carl Woese and other molecular evolutionists, biologists came to appreciate the commonality among all organisms, all being comprised of cells that bear a remarkable similarity to one another and that share a common evolutionary ancestry, and consequently with major features of a largely shared genetic code and molecular biology. In this sense microbiology and biology as a whole became unified as they never had been before.

Though molecular sequencing of genomes and metagenomes has revealed immense diversity within the category microorganisms, now known to represent three distinct domains of life, Bacteria, Archaea and Eucarya, and perhaps hiding even more undiscovered types including a potential fourth domain according to recent suggestions [3,4], considering them together has scientific advantages. These include the nature of the associations and symbioses among members, the effects of scale on processes such as nutrition, the application of similar metagenomic methods to study of their diversity and ecology, the insights of a comparative approach to their genomics and potential evolutionary relationships, and analogies in some of their growth habits and strategies such as the mycelial habit of both actinobacteria and mycelial fungi [5]. When we consider a natural community, all three domains of cellular life often live together, and together with their respective viruses. Thus, methods first applied to bacteria and archaea for direct characterization of natural communities are increasingly being applied also to
