WORK

The scientific definition of work differs in some ways from its everyday meaning. Certain things we think of as hard work, such as writing an exam or carrying a heavy load on level ground, are not work as defined by a scientist. The scientific definition of work reveals its relationship to energy—whenever work is done, energy is transferred. For work, in the scientific sense, to be done, a force must be exerted and there must be motion or displacement in the direction of the force.

In physics, work is defined as a force causing the movement—or displacement—of an object. In the case of a constant force, work is the scalar product of the force acting on an object and the displacement caused by that force. Though both force and displacement are vector quantities, work has no direction due to the nature of a scalar product (or dot product) in vector mathematics. This definition is consistent with the proper definition because a constant force integrates to merely the product of the force and distance.

Work is calculated as the force times the distance. The following equation is used to describe work:

$$\text{Work} = \text{Force} \times \text{distance or } W = Fd$$

The standard unit for work is the joule (J). The joule is the same as a newton-meter where the newton is the force and the meter is the distance. The distance (or displacement) in work is the distance from the start point to the end point. The amount of traveling in between doesn't matter. For example, if you lift a weight off the ground and then place it back on the ground the distance (or displacement) is zero. Measuring work can sometimes be tricky. In order for the equation $W = Fd$ to work, the force used in the equation must be the force used to cause the displacement or distance. Also, remember for work to have occurred, the object must be displaced by the force. Otherwise, the distance, or "d", in the formula is 0 and the work will be 0.

Here are some examples: If someone is pushing on a wall with all their might, but the wall doesn't move, no work has occurred. This is because the distance is zero. If someone is using force to hold a rock over their head while walking eastward across a field, no work has occurred. This is because the force is not in the same direction (the force is up) as the distance moved by the rock (eastward). If you do a full push-up, lifting yourself up and then back down, the total work is zero. This is because the total distance from the starting point to the ending point is zero. If you drop your pencil, then work has
